1. Introduction

Eyes are the skylight to the soul. Psychologists enclose and explained many behavioral aspects of a person based on eye response. For instance, if your young son does not look you in the eye while answering a question, he is doubtless not being entirely truthful. Displeasure flashed in her eyes' is a declaration we have all heard which is used to describe an angry individual. So, eyes are 'reflectors' of our sentiment. In that sense they are certainly 'windows' through which others can 'see' us. But there is more. That the eyes, especially the iris, are a pin pointer to an individuals' health status is the basis of a separate branch of study called Iridology. To iridologists then, the eyes are 'windows' to a persons' health. Iridologists study the iris, pupil and sclera paying particular attention to the color and markings in these parts of the eye. They then compare the results to an iris chart, which divides the iris into a variety of precincts that correspond with dissimilar parts of the body. The diagnosis is based on any discrepancy that the comparison may reveal. Yet another 'window' move toward declares that the color of a persons' eye is an indicator of one's' personality and ability.¹⁻⁴ The color of one's' eyes reflects individuality- it depends entirely on the genetic make-up of the individual!

The amount and type of color coloring in the iris defines eye color. In humans, phenotypically, eye color falls into one of these basic categories -brown, blue or green. Brown eyes are the most common (due to their foremost nature), followed by blue and then green. Other eye colors are variants that occur due to different ratios of color pigments present in the iris. As a result, apart from the above-mentioned three colors, we also see people who have black eyes (Native Americans and Asians), hazel, gray, green and violet eyes (Europeans and their descendants), . These marvelous eye colors have been indicated to reflect many a personality trait.

Accordingly, brown eyes symbolize sharpness, blue eye, sweetness and green eyes, mischievousness. Various observations and studies have revealed interesting pointers. For instance, dark -eyed people seem to score more in areas of social skills, emotions and neurotic behaviour than light-eyed people.
